

Deutsche Schule Thessaloniki
Model United Nations

Security Council Manual

Table of Contents

1. Introduction
2. What is the UN Security Council?
3. Participating Member States
 - 3.1 Permanent Members of the Security Council
 - 3.2 Non-Permanent Members of the Security Council
4. Debate
 - 4.1 Quorum
 - 4.2 Draft Resolutions
 - 4.3 Debate Mode
 - 4.4 Points and Motions
 - 4.5 Amendments
 - 4.6 Voting
 - 4.7 Veto Power
 - 4.8 P5 Caucus
5. Closing remarks

1. Introduction

Dear Delegates,

The following is the Manual for the United Nations Security Council. This document strives to provide you with the basic knowledge needed for participating in the Security Council of the DSTMUN Conference. This Committee is intended for experienced delegates that are willing to conduct extensive research on the topics and be very active during Committee work.

We hope that this manual will be useful and practical for your preparation as delegates in the most demanding Committee of them all!

We look forward to meeting you all in November!

The DSTMUN Organizing Team

2. What is the UN Security Council?

The United Nations Security Council (UNSC) is one of the six main organs of the United Nations, whose purpose is the maintenance of international peace and security. The Security Council is comprised of fifteen Member-States and each member state has one vote. Under the Charter of the United Nations, the decisions of the Council are legally binding for all UN Member States. The basic structure of the Council is set out in Chapter V of the UN Charter.

3. Participating Member States

3.1 Permanent Members of the Security Council

The five Permanent Members of the Security Council are the People's Republic of China, the French Republic, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States of America. These states (commonly referred to as the P5) have veto powers, which means that they are able to veto clauses or resolutions from passing. For the purposes of this conference, any vote against a clause, amendment or resolution by a P5 Member State will count as a veto.

3.2 Non-Permanent Members of the Security Council

The remaining ten Members of the Security Council are elected by the UN General Assembly for two-year terms starting on 1 January, with five replaced each year. These Member States do not have veto powers. A retiring member is not eligible for immediate re-election.

According to Articles 31 and 32 of Chapter V of the UN Charter, additional States whose interests are directly affected by a dispute under consideration by the Security Council can participate in the discussion relating to the dispute. These Observer States are not entitled to a vote.

4. Debate

4.1 Quorum

In the UN Security Council, a Quorum can be achieved when at least 9 members are present, including all of the Permanent Members of the Security Council.

4.2 Draft Resolutions

Draft Resolutions are expected from all delegates coming to the DSTMUN Security Council. During Lobbying, delegates are able to move around the room and negotiate with their fellows about the matter-at-hand, compare and discuss their clauses, gather support from allies for their own clauses or form new clauses out of existing ones. It is typical that any veto threat is thoroughly discussed during this process. The Expert Chair will assist the delegates in providing them with information on the topic and on the process of writing operative clauses. In the Security Council, delegates have access to additional stock phrases for operative clauses, which can be found in the Delegate

Manual. At the end of this process, there should be one resolution with all of the clauses, where each clause is assigned to a main submitter. Pre-ambulatory clauses do not need a main submitter.

4.3 Debate Mode

In DSTMUN, draft-resolutions are debated upon clause by clause by default. A Motion to divide the Question is welcome, but not necessary. The Presidency is free to select which clauses will be debated upon and which will be discarded based on which clauses are the most constructive and original.

Every operative clause is debated and voted upon separately, while the perambulatory clauses are debated upon as a whole. Operative clauses are debated upon in open debate by default, meaning that a delegate who takes the floor is free to deliver a speech either in favor or against the clause. It is up to the discretion of the Presidency to set debate time on each clause. Clauses do not need to be debated upon for an equal amount of time. Delegates are able to use the Motion to limit/extend debate time in order to adjust the amount of time spent on any one clause.

4.4 Points and Motions

The Points available to the delegates in the Security Council are the same as in every other Committee. This includes the Right of Reply, which is to be used when the national integrity of a Member State has been impugned by another delegate.

When it comes to the Motions, the Security Council operates on the same Motions as any other committee, with the addition of the Motion to move to P5 Caucus, which is explained in section 4.8 of this document.

All general Points, Motions and Yields can be found in the Rules of Procedure and Conduct of the Conference.

4.5 Amendments

Delegates are able to propose first and second degree amendments to the clause at-hand during the debate on that clause, in order to make changes to its content. If a clause has already been voted upon, no amendments to that clause will be in order. Amendments to strike out a clause will also not be in order. Additionally, after all initial clauses have been debated upon, delegates are able to propose additional clauses to be added to the resolution via amendments. Amendments should be submitted on the official amendment sheet and be debated upon in closed debate.

4.6 Voting

When voting, delegates may vote in favor, against, or abstain. In the Security Council, the voting process can be separated into three categories:

Firstly, voting on procedural matters, where a simple majority is required. In these instances, the P5 Members are unable to exercise their veto-powers.

When voting on amendments, a simple majority is needed, with the P5 Members being able to exercise their veto-powers.

When voting on clauses and resolutions, a supermajority of 9 votes in favor is needed and P5 members are able to exercise their veto power. If any P5 country votes against, this will constitute a veto, and the clause/resolution will not pass.

4.7 Veto Power

In the real United Nations Security Council, P5 Member States rarely exercise their veto-powers. The veto is only used when a state feels that its own national integrity is threatened by the content of the draft-resolution. Delegates are expected to use this power responsibly and not hinder the work of the Security Council. If any delegate uses their veto-powers to obstruct the work of the Council, the Presidency may proceed to inform the Secretariat and the delegate's MUN Advisor. A prudent alternative to a negative vote by a

P5 Member is an abstention, which does not constitute a veto or a positive vote.

When wishing to use their veto-powers on a clause or a resolution, the delegate must either inform the Presidency via note or state their intent during a speech prior to the vote. If the veto-threat is exercised via note to the Presidency, the Presidency will then proceed to inform the Council of this threat.

4.8 P5 Caucus

After a veto-threat, a P5 Member may raise a motion to move to P5 Caucus, so that the Permanent Members may discuss the reasoning behind the use of veto-powers and the possibility of an alternative solution. When moving to a P5 Caucus, the expert chair will escort the Permanent Members to a different room, while the rest of the Council will continue with debate. There may be no voting during a P5 Caucus.

After a P5 Caucus, the Presidency will entertain a speech by a member of the P5 on the results of said Caucus. Regardless of the outcome of the P5 Caucus, the Council will then proceed to vote on the matter-at-hand.

5. Closing remarks

The UN Security Council is considered by many to be the most significant body of the United Nations. Delegates must always remember their obligation to work towards maintaining peace and security around the globe. Delegates must also bear in mind the weight of their decisions, which are legally binding for all UN Member States. We hope that this Manual has provided you with the essential information needed to participate in this Committee.